The Conference venue hall. Store Kannikestræde is one of Copenhagen's most historic and atmospheric streets, located in the heart of the Latin Quarter. It runs from Frue Plads to Købmagergade (near the Round Tower).

The name "Kannike" is the Danish word for Canon (a priest). The street was named after the canons who lived there and served at the nearby Church of Our Lady in the Middle Ages.

Christian IV's small favourite castle has an idyllic location, next to the King's Garden in the heart of Copenhagen. Today, this Renaissance castle houses the Danish crown jewels, which are worn by the reigning King and Queen on special occasions. You can also visit Christian IV's audience rooms and see the bedchamber where he passed away, in 1648. In the Treasury beneath the castle, you can see the Danish crown jewels, the magnificent royal crowns and the Crown regalia.

Halls and rooms at the Amalienborg Museum

Take a tour through the private offices of four Danish kings and Queen Louise's sitting room

The private offices of the Danish Glücksborg monarchs

The museum comprises the private offices of four Danish kings and visit Queen Louise's cluttered sitting room, which was originally described as her study or office. This naming practice illustrates that the Danish queens during this period were not just figureheads but had their own royal duties to attend to.

The museum's beautiful and varied rooms were originally located in three of the four palaces that make up the Amalienborg complex. Later, they were recreated at the Amalienborg Museum in rooms that are fairly similar to their original settings. Thus, Frederik VIII's imposing study originally occupied the same place in the Royal Family's present residential palace, in the room where HM King Frederik X now gives his annual TV-transmitted New Year's address to the nation.

Frederik IX also resided in the palace where the Royal Couple now have their residence. His bright and elegant study, decorated with both historical objects and modern furniture design, is the first room you see on your tour. Next, you go back three generations in time, to the first of the Glücksborg kings, Christian IX, whose dark study, full of family photos, has been recreated in the corner room.

Christian X is the only one of the Glücksborg kings who had his residence in the palace that now houses the museum. Thus, his study is the only one that is still in its original location.
